Judicial Training in ASEAN:
A Comparative Overview of Systems and Programs

April 2014
A. Training Organization and Institutionalisation

1. Relevant Recent Legal and Judicial Reforms

Since the reform process after the fall of the New Order in 1998, the judiciary has undergone some significant reforms. The most fundamental reform that relates to how judicial training is organized is the transfer of the administrative control over the courts from the executive to the judiciary, the so-called “one roof system.” This led to organizational changes and a subsequent expansion of the responsibilities of the Supreme Court (Mahkamah Agung). Based on an amendment of the Constitution (1999-2002), a Judicial Commission (Komisi Yudisial) was established. It was later given the authority to improve the capacity of judges.

The Judicial Training Center (Pusat Pendidikan dan Pelatihan Mahkamah Agung), hereinafter JTC, developed from a research and education unit in the Supreme Court first established in 1994. Previously, it only provided in-service training to judges of up to five days as “supplementary” to the past initial judicial training that was organized by the judicial training centre of the Ministry of Justice. The authority to conduct judicial training was transferred by the government to the Supreme Court only in 2003. As a result of the one roof system, the research and education unit in the Supreme Court became a higher administrative organ within the judiciary, and the Secretary of the Supreme Court further divided this organ into three units: the research unit, the “technical” or judicial training unit, and the management training unit. Nowadays, the JTC is the responsible unit for training and education. It operates a centralized training facility in Bogor that was established in 2008. The tasks of JTC are, among others, to develop and to organize different judicial training programs.

Several judges are assigned by the Supreme Court to be permanent trainers for a period of time and a number of senior judges and/or academics are invited to lecture occasionally. 4. Necessity of Undergoing Pre-Judicature Training

To become a judge in Indonesia, one should have undergone judicial training. Additionally, a bachelor’s degree in law or its equivalent is generally required to become a judge, except for the position at the industrial relations court, which only requires a bachelor’s degree from the applicant. Aside from the initial judicial training program, the “certification” training program for ad-hoc judge candidates who possibly have no legal academic 156 According to the new rules, the selection process of judges should be conducted by the Supreme Court and Judicial Commission. See Law No. 49/2009 on the General Court, Art. 14A; Religious Court, Art. 13A; and Law no. 51/2009 on the Administrative Court, Art. 14A.

background, for example, those in the industrial court, familiarizes them with court procedures. Ad-hoc judges are required to take the “certification” training after passing the entrance exams.

B. Structure and Content of Training Programme for Judges

1. Structure of Training Curriculum

The JTC is still making efforts to carry out its reform agendas. Nonetheless, generally speaking, the JTC has three separate judicial training programs: the integrated initial judicial training program (PPC Terpadu), the Continuing Judicial Education (CJE), and the “certification” training.159

a.) PPC Terpadu

PPC Terpadu is a two-year training program for judge candidates, before they are appointed as judges, and is a combination of training (courses) and internship. After considering some similar practices at the Dutch Judicial Training Institution (SSR), the JTC launched a special curriculum for this program in 2010, including subjects in each stage of the training process that reflect the daily tasks and responsibilities of judges.

This compulsory program consists of three different stages in which each candidate is trained to perform all daily tasks at the court, i.e. court administration, case management, and judicial competence.160 The curriculum is divided into these three components. For each component, the candidates should take courses at the JTC that lasts for three months, each followed by a semester of court internship under the supervision of a senior judge (mentor). At the end of the program, a candidate should further take a one-month internship at a prosecutor’s office or a law firm. Judicial integrity (ethics) and judicial independence are integrally included in the curriculum.

b.) Continuing Judicial Education

CJE is a supplementary training for judges, including ad hoc judges, who have worked for 1-5 years and 6-10 years. It is organized for six days and the materials are defined by a training needs analysis. In such trainings, a number of senior judges and academics are involved as trainers.

c.) “Certification” Training

“Certification” training is provided for ad hoc judges, or career judges who work for special courts, and is organized for six days. Only the training for anti-corruption judges takes 18 days. There appears to be no written structured curriculum for the training for the different special courts, although some materials were observed to have been collected from the trainers in the “certification” training for industrial judges.161

161 Miranda Fajerman. Report, Training Needs Assessment for Industrial Relations Court Judges 27. Based on this report, with the support of the International Labour Organization (ILO), the Supreme Court launched a curriculum for industrial judges in 2013. In the beginning, the “certification” training was intended only for (ad-hoc) judges in special courts, but last year, JTC also organized training for environment cases.
2. Content of Training Curriculum: Selected Specific Topics

a.) Judicial Ethics

Indonesian judges are subject to the Code of Ethics. Training and examination on the Code of Ethics are mandatory. This subject can be further found in PPC Terpadu, CJE, as well as in the “certification” training for industrial judges and anti-corruption judges. Judicial independence is also considered in the constitutional law subject given during the initial judicial training program. There is, however, no document reporting how this subject is taught. In its policy paper, the Judicial Commission also states that it will provide a code of ethics training, a special training on legal procedure, and a thematic training on a particular legal field. Similarly, no report on its implementation has been published.

b.) Human Rights and/or Fair Trial Rights

Human rights and/or fair trial rights are included in PPC Terpadu and in the “certification” curriculum for industrial judges, albeit no report on its implementation is available so far. Furthermore, the Judicial Commission also has included human rights courses in its supplementary training.

c.) ASEAN Instruments

The integrated initial judicial training program (PPC Terpadu) only provides judges with basic judicial training and it does not include subjects on the ASEAN Charter or other ASEAN legal instruments.

d.) International/Comparative Law and Conflict of Laws

The existing curriculum for the initial judicial training program pays little attention to international legal instruments, but the more advanced curriculum for industrial relations judges has already included some cross-border legal cases and international legal instruments. Similarly, conflict of laws is not included in PPC Terpadu. However, the new curriculum for industrial judges covers some topics on conflict of laws in the area of labour law. This may also be the case in other “certification” trainings, although such a curriculum would merely be made on ad hoc basis. While ordinary judges might still handle cases that include cross-border issues in their daily work, it seems that the JTC does not consider this as a potential structural problem.

3. Continuing Judicial Education

The JTC has recently taken initiatives to offer “mid-career” judges with Continuing Judicial Education. However, the program is still a developing process and it might be too early to see its impact. This program is intended for judges with 1-5 years and 6-10 years working experience and the materials are prepared through an ad hoc training needs analysis. In 2012, this training was focused on case management, the quality of decisions, and the Code of Ethics.\(^\text{167}\) Programs on jurisprudence likely need further developments in Indonesia. In reference to training for commercial judges, for instance, one author wrote that the mistakes in the application of law involved fundamental principles of substantive laws, such as contracts and corporations, which are regularly taught to students in law faculties everywhere.\(^\text{168}\)
